"I am a lie who always tells the truth"

O'Keefe's far from glueless

Despite an in-depth report by The Claretian Echo earlier this year regarding the modern craze of young couples experimenting with gluing their heads together, it appears that some St Clarets players are still refusing to listen to the message.

The latest to fall victim of the phenomenon is full-back Liam O'Keefe (left), who has been spotted with his head attached to a women on a number of occasions over the past few months.

Club chairman John Kelly is said to be furious that this practice is still going on in the club. He has vowed to bang heads together if he finds out about any other players getting involved. (Kind of missing the point there John don't you think!)

Two heads better than one cern the officials but a darker side to the practice also emerged last weekend, when young starlet Conor Healy ended up in hospital after attempting to break away from the person with whom he had become surgically attached.

Healy's mother, Patricia, was furious that her son had consented to the procedure in the first place, when he became

The Echo (Issue 34) carries a warning message

Meanwhile, defender Aidan Donaghy is reported to have taken the fad a step further by gluing his head to a table while visiting Dublin last weekend.

Well it was better than gluing himself to Barry Lynch's head I guess!

Glued down: Donaghy

Introducing Sheamus Shillhealy

Healy as Sheamus Shillhealy

In a desperate attempt to avoid the publicity that his regular mentions in this publication have attracted, Claretian star Matt Healy has been working on a new look which he hopes will buy him some privacy.

After week's of experimentation, Healy went to Dublin recently to finalise the details of his new image and proudly posted the end result on Facebook. The "new me" as Healy put it, turns out to be a tribute to Irish wrestling star Sheamus. Healy is calling his alter-ego Sheamus Shillhealy

The real Sheamus: the Dublin born wrestling star
