Barry's Got Talent

St Clarets supporters are reported to have been queuing outside ITV studios since last Monday, hoping to get tickets to cheer on captain Barry Lynch during his appearance on hit TV show Britain's Got Talent.

The fans, all dressed in St Clarets jerseys, have gathered outside the studios in London, waving banners announcing that Barry's Got Talent, as they wait for the box office to open for next Saturday's live show.

Lynch shot to fame in recent weeks when a YouTube video showing him demonstrating his Travolta-like dance moves went viral, prompting BGT bosses to take the unusual step of contacting Lynch, rather than waiting for the Kerry kicker to apply to go on the show through the audition process.

All Claretians wish Barry well this Saturday night, when he is due to perform his signature dance The Valentia Valeta.

It ain't 'Alf cold mum

Young starlet Alfie McNulty has decided to call time on his latest romance, after deciding that the commitment needed to date a mermaid was too much for him. Looks like you might have left in a bit of a hurry Alfie!

Sean's still very nice

Angered by recent suggestions that he was just too nice, Claretian nice guy Sean Killeen has set about creating an alter-ego, to prove that he has an edgier side to his personality.

Having decided to focus on the work of Sasha Baron Cohen in his hunt for inspiration, Killeen settled on Borat, the awkward, bumbling Kazakhstan researcher, who shot to fame in the 2006 movie bearing his name.

Coincidentally, Borat's catch phrase was "very nice" which of course would still make Sean very nice.
